2. Data collection

When you use sensors to make measurements, having a record of the data is often useful. Although it is possible to simply write down all the data, that is time consuming, potentially error-prone, and those hand-written data may be difficult to use later. If the data taken by a sensor are important, it is useful to have a device that can store the data and easily export them into a spreadsheet or a database program.